Chirpy Chicken leaned across the counter of the Midville soda fountain and sighed. "We've just got to help Henery win that school quiz contest!" he said to Shirley Sparrow, who sat on one of the stools, glumly sipping her chocolate malt.

"But we've tried everything already," Shirley countered. "I spent three hours last night drilling him on history questions — and he couldn't even tell me where the French Revolution took place!"

"If you ask me," said another student, "Henery can never beat Ollie Owl! Why do you suppose he told the teacher he'd be in the contest, anyway?"

"Henery said he wanted to get even with Ollie for always making fun of him," Chirpy replied.

"And I don't blame him," Shirley added. "Ollie always goes around bragging how much he knows—"

Just at that moment Ollie swaggered through the door and sat down beside Shirley. "One strawberry soda," he cried, adjusting his glasses, which had slipped askew, "and please be quick about it! I must hurry off to the library!"

"My gracious, Ollie," exclaimed Shirley. "Surely you don't need to study any more!"

"I just want to brush up on my Shakespeare," Ollie explained. "No one knows who's going to ask the questions. I must be prepared for anything!"

Chirpy stared at Ollie in amazed disbelief. "Why, you know ten times more than Henery already!" he said.

"Well, I must admit I feel pretty confident," Ollie conceded. "Now, if Henery would spend a little time in the library, instead of playing baseball—"

"I have been in the library," Henery interrupted as he entered the shop. "Just because you saw me, playing baseball yesterday afternoon—"

"Tut, tut!" admonished Ollie, primly. "Excuses will not win that contest." He gathered up his books and sauntered to the door. "Well, I must be off," he continued, gesturing dramatically. " 'To be or not to be—' "

"Just listen to him!" Shirley said. "Reciting Shakespeare all over the place!"

"Gee," muttered Henery with a heavy sigh, "is that who wrote those lines?"

"Oh, Henery!" cried Shirley in exasperation. "What are we going to do?"

An hour later Chirpy and Shirley were both pacing anxiously up and down outside the auditorium, hesitating to enter.

"You go watch," sighed Chirpy. "I can't bear to see what's going to happen."

"Neither can I," answered Shirley, sadly, as time passed. "Oh, Chirpy, I hope he remembers some of the things we studied last night! If only we had known what kinds of questions would be asked—"

Suddenly there was a loud roar of applause from the auditorium, indicating that the quiz was finally over.

A crowd of jubilant youngsters trooped into the foyer, and in the middle of the group stood Henery, waving a large gold Winner's Cup.

"Hey, Chirpy! Shirley! I won!" Henery cried as his two friends stared at one another in amazement. "It was simple!" he continued with a happy grin. "Turned out that Leo De Rocker of the Midgets asked all the questions . . . and they were all about baseball!"
